Venezuela is looking into partnering with China to build a series of solar power plants, according to the Spanish news agency Europa Press. The reports comes after President Nicolas Maduro recently met with Wang Tao, the director of the Beijing Institute of Optics and Fine Mechanics, and other Chinese dignitaries in Caracas. The companies involved are also said to be having serious talks regarding a possible expansion of lithium-ion battery storage for the Venezuelan government. It's unclear at this time what specific projects the companies are looking at – such as the Chajul and El Libertador sites – but it's not hard to see how such a project could be very beneficial for the South American country. In a country that suffers from some of the highest rates of electricity use and power outages in the region, a massive project like this would provide a variety of benefits – such as reducing energy imports and increasing domestic production. Another interesting aspect of the news is that one of the projects being considered is a solar power plant in the eastern state of Aragua, which is currently run by China's JA Solar. Earlier this year, Venezuela's Oil Minister Gustavo Rojas said the country is looking to build more than 100 megawatts of renewable energy projects in the country, including wind and solar. The country has seen a large increase in solar power generation in recent years as a result of a series of government incentives that have helped to build installations like the one in Aragua. Electrek's Take I really like the idea of having a massive project like this, but I changes in the T cell repertoire in neonatal immune suppression. Early-life immune suppression by neonatal thymectomy, neonatal glucocorticoid treatment, or exposure to infectious or noninfectious agents results in profound alteration in the T cell repertoire as well as in the expression of T cell surface receptors. These alterations appear to be due to the fact that thymectomy, glucocorticoid treatment, and infection result in transient ablation of intrathymic T cell development. Thymectomy and infectious agents promote an active, donor-type T cell response that can be suppressed by immune-regulatory cytokines and has an unusually high frequency of gamma delta T cells. Thymectomy and glucocorticoid treatment lead to increased numbers of alphabeta T cells with a high proportion of alpha beta TCR-bearing T cells in the thymus and peripheral lymphoid organs. Furthermore, glucocorticoid treatment also leads to increased numbers of peripheral alpha beta T cells expressing CD4 or CD8. The increase in the frequency of CD4+ T cells after glucocorticoid treatment correlates with upregulation of CD2 and CD5 on the surface of the T cells. Infectious agents may cause preferential expansion of alpha beta T cells with a TCR composed of the variable, immunoglobulin V region from a particular antigen. Despite the increased numbers of cells, the T cell receptor from these cells is usually not clonally expanded, as is typical of an immune response. Collectively, these observations suggest that in early life, thymic deletion of T cells and antigenic selection regulate the T cell repertoire. In contrast, the developmental pathways leading to CD4+ and CD8+ T cells are changed by glucocorticoid treatment and by infectious agents.
