I have my app that is using the Google Login API to authenticate a user for the Google Apps (OAuth2). The issue I'm having is that the callback url is firing every time a user authenticates for the Google Login API, so it's sending multiple calls to the api with the same signature. I want to create a batch request to send to the google accounts api, and I have my oAuth token in the header. The issue is I can't access the oAuth token in the header because it's not loaded when the batch call is sent. Is there a way I can load my oAuth token inside my app for a batch call? Is there any way I can exchange my callback url with another url that might be a better fit for a batch call? UPDATE: A lightbulb has just come on! It's something I'm doing wrong, but I'm not sure what. If I look at this (adding the oauth header to the call in the batch request) You should add the oauth header to each call. If you add the oauth header to one call, the same value will be added to any subsequent calls. Not a great example, but perhaps this hint is showing the the new call needs to be written in the same way as the example calls? So how do I make the following call in a batch call request? client_id=myclient &redirect_uri=my.url.here &scope=profile email &response_type=token &approval_prompt=force &access_type=offline
