What's New in the?

People have grown dependent on their mobile phones, and many institutions such as banks, airlines, and grocery stores provide their services only using mobile devices. Therefore, their cost and availability is critical to a thriving business. The networks are not constructed for real-time traffic. They have reasonable throughput and delay at peak traffic but their ability to scale down to handle extreme traffic events, which are becoming more frequent, is poor. In addition, the throughput and delay of the networks are not optimal for multimedia traffic, including voice over internet protocol (VoIP) traffic. This is one of the reasons why some people do not use VoIP applications in the networks. Service providers and clients have little control of the quality of service (QoS) they receive. A client or a service provider must assume that the network that they receive service from does not guarantee a minimum degree of quality of service that is acceptable for a given application. Providing cost-effective bandwidth and delivering the appropriate QoS is a problem. The core of a network is usually a collection of network devices such as routers, switches, and gateways. These devices may be coupled in a mesh topology with a common control plane. A single point of management and control is required to view the topology of the network and all status information. The common control plane enables network control systems to configure the network devices efficiently. Network Management Systems (NMS) are the systems that perform the configuration tasks for the network devices. A Control Plane for Network Devices (CPD) is a solution that combines the control plane and the data plane to provide scalability to the network. In a CPD solution, each network device operates in a unique control domain, i.e., a physical domain (Pd) of the network device. The Pd is the portion of the network for which the network device is responsible. The Pd may be the entire physical deployment of the network, a section of the network, or any other manageable sub-network of the network. A given network device may be responsible for the entire Pd, or for a sub-portion of it, or for multiple sub-portions of the network. When a network device (e.g., a router) receives a network management message, it decides whether the information to be processed is relevant to the device's Pd. An NMS allows network devices to communicate with it via an Open Service Interface (OSI) layer 7 (application level) protocol. A network device in the CPD solution can be
