Click the following article to read the news on 'ekahau site survey activation'.Regulation of the inositol lipid cycle by extracellular adenine nucleotides in primary astrocytes: a study of perturbations of basal inositol metabolism. The involvement of specific inositol phospholipids in the regulation of inositol lipid turnover and signalling in astrocytes has been postulated based on in vitro studies and suggested by the in vivo results of inositol depletion experiments. The present study was aimed at clarifying whether extracellular purine nucleotides regulate basal inositol lipid turnover in astrocytes. In isolated primary cultures of rat cerebral cortex astrocytes, treatment with two different purine nucleotides, adenosine (30 microM) or its analogue 5'-(N-ethyl)carboxamideadenosine (NECA, 1-100 microM), inhibited inositol phosphate (InsP) accumulation induced by the phosphatidylinositol-specific phospholipase C of the enzyme [A. Corbo, J.D. Lavin, L.C. Wilson, J.R. DeLuca, F. Burggren (1988) Endocrinology (in press)] but did not alter the basal turnover of InsPs in intact cells. Incubation of astrocytes with NECA or 5'-(N-ethyl)carboxamideadenosine had no effect on the cellular content of inositol phosphates and phosphoinositides. When these compounds were added to astrocytes in Ca2+-free buffer, which induces rapid accumulation of InsPs in cells prelabeled with [(3)H]inositol, they were found to inhibit the Ca2+-induced release of radioactivity from astrocytes. On the other hand, incubation of cells with 4-bromobenzoyl-myo-inositol, an inhibitor of the enzyme responsible for the formation of phosphatidylinositol from inositol, potentiated the Ca2+-induced release of radioactivity from astrocytes. Inhibitors of protein kinase C and protein kinase A, which are known to affect InsP turnover in a variety of cell types, were found to have no effect on the Occ13bf012
