The agency says it will reassess the program in 2021, when new information is available. The lawsuit settled this spring after the EPA agreed to implement a system that gave states two extra years to revise their pollution rules. But opponents of the program, including many Republicans, said that deal weakens the federal government's ability to control air pollution, a criticism that the agency appears to be addressing in the new announcement. The children are ordered by their text length. The objective is to sort the list by text length of each of the points. My current attempt is to create an array of lists by keeping a counter on each child and increment that counter whenever the text length changes. I don't think this is a good approach. Is there any other way to sort this by text length? Or any idea how I can achieve this by using Linq? A: Since you have a list of objects you can use a LINQ query to transform the object list into a list of a new type. Then you can sort a list of that new type. void Main() { var list = new List();
