An alternative hypothesis is that a mutation which alters the alternative splicing pattern of a specific gene may interfere with the production of a protein required for the stability of the DSB trans--splicing complex. Indeed, splicing factors have already been proposed to maintain the stability of the splicing machinery ([@B33]). All these findings bring new knowledge on how the genome is corrected in humans. The discovery of cis--trans RNA--DNA hybrids is another fascinating area where the role of RNA in DDT is taking shape. This finding highlights the presence of RNA--DNA

What's new:

Permafrost is a type of soil which has a sub-zero temperature (less than or equal to 0°C) during the majority of the year. When this soil warms for the remaining months or season, it could be described as a 'stuck' high temperature, not a constantly freezing and thawing soil. The cause of this phenomenon is also known as 'seasonal thaw'. This is when the freezing of the soil, thawing and freezing again right back to an earlier stage than before, results in a thermal feedback loop that will continue for months until the balance is back to normal. We know a lot about the feedback loop in carbon balance, but the other pieces that make up the loop are still not fully understood. Scientific evidence shows that there is a so-called 'shell' of frozen ground that gets warmer quicker than the rest of the soil when temperatures are increasing. This causes there to be an early thaw of it, and so the ability of one increment to be reported to the next is less, and all of the positive feedback occurs in one place, ending with a view of a very sudden and drastic change in temperature. During this timeframe, even though it is 90°F outside, it is freezing or really close to freezing in the shell of frozen ground, and so it will take less time for it to reach the freezing point, causing massive thawing to occur. However, there have not been many studies made to measure these 'shells of frozen ground' or to look at the rate that the frozen ground thaws. Visual inspection is considered to be a way of doing this, and it is noticeable to see how the temperature reacts to the change in temperature, and how quickly the shell of frozen ground warms up. One of these 'visual inspections' is conducted by the researchers who are studying the Permafrost that was presented in the previous video. This installation is in Siberia,

Russia, and the depth that was found was a staggering 230 meters, in one location. There have only been a handful of similar studies, and most of these are in the North of the United States. This study comes from Ocean Drilling Program (ODP) 1066. These expeditions are set up to study the earth's core in much more detail than past expeditions. Through this data, the researchers were able to gather readings of total Debye Temperature (De
