Because Photoshop is not a design program, you can't go into Photoshop and just make a cool design as you can in a design program. However, you can use Photoshop's basic tools to produce graphics that look decent and that can be edited to look even better. That's one of the most useful aspects of Photoshop. Some print designers believe that Photoshop is the only way to go because it has the most features and allows full creative control over an image. It can do just about anything — except make an attractive design. On the other hand, some Web designers don't like the fact that Photoshop can harm a Web site if a badly designed Photoshop file is saved with the file. ## Exporting Images After an image is finished and its layers are applied as needed, you can export an image to your hard drive for use in a variety of ways. These functions are useful in four different situations: * For print: Print images require special considerations and special limitations on how you save them. Photoshop saves images in standard TIFF (True-Type Interchange Format) files, which may not be compatible with third-party software that reads TIFF files. Photoshop also allows you to save images directly to PDF (Portable Document Format) files, which are widely read by most graphics software packages, as well as by portable scanners and multifunction printers (see Figures 5-18 and 5-19). Most other image editing programs, including Paint Shop Pro, Photoshop Elements, CorelDRAW, and Adobe Illustrator, allow you to export images to the following formats: TIFF, JPEG (commonly known as _JPG_), GIF (Graphics Interchange Format), and PNG (Portable Network Graphics). The most efficient method is to export the image to a format that preserves the original colors as closely as possible. Most software that can save to PDF formats also can save to TIFF format as well. * For the Web: Web graphics offer the same constraints as print images do. Many graphics software packages, including Adobe Dreamweaver, CanvasXpress, and Adobe Fireworks, save images to TIFF files that are not compatible with Web browsers. The European Competition Authority issued new details yesterday about its ongoing investigation of Nokia and Microsoft. The investigation is examining whether Nokia's (NOK) acquisition of Microsoft's (MSFT) mobile phone business was based on "unlawful" threats to break up the mobile industry. The investigation has been ongoing since September 2012, and the EU noted that progress has been made, but it has yet to issue a statement about its conclusions. The EU has also told businesses to stay the heck out of the investigation, including manufacturers, retailers, and carriers. The latest developments are centered on the allegations of a Nokia lawyer who worked on the deal and has been suspended from working on telecommunications matters in the EU. According to an internal EU document, the lawyer wanted to change the deal to "prevent Nokia from acquiring Alcatel-Lucent (ALU)," the French-based telecom company that today has a $14.8 billion market capitalization. The lawyer also wanted to add an additional condition that would require Nokia to purchase a stake in Nokia Siemens Networks (NSN). Nokia at the time was purchasing Alcatel-Lucent's mobile phone business and the conditions were discussed before Nokia and Microsoft publicly announced their deal in May 2011. EU concerns about the "unlawful" behavior were first raised by Swiss competition regulators in November 2012. They based that claim on a study that showed that the deal could hurt consumers by allowing Nokia to control 70% of the global mobile network equipment market and triple its share in the European mobile network equipment market, according to the EU. European officials gave a broad statement about the case in October. They said that they saw no "unlawful conduct" and Nokia doesn't have to buy any additional shares of NSN. "Nokia and Microsoft have confirmed that they comply with the rules on State Aid in all Member States," said Commissioner Margrethe Vestager. Nokia, which noted that the EU "is unable to obtain any evidence of the allegations," has responded to the EU's accusations. "Nokia confirms that it complied with the relevant EU State Aid rules before and after the acquisition of Alcatel-Lucent's telecommunications division. As the EU does not have any evidence to support the allegations, Nokia does not agree with the conclusions of the announcement which is currently being reviewed by the EU decision makers," said Nokia. "Nokia has a long-standing record of providing direct employment, and
