Efficacy of a Self-Assessable Dysuria Scoring Chart to Detect Lower Urinary Tract Symptoms in the General Population. Dysuria is a common symptom of lower urinary tract symptoms (LUTS) but is not a symptom of benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH). We aimed to assess the efficacy of a self-assessable dysuria scoring chart (ADSC) to detect LUTS in the general population. The ADSC was given to 420 participants in a health promotion program for chronic diseases. Those with ADSC scores higher than 3 or urinary urgency were invited to a specialist clinic where they underwent a full clinical evaluation and a validated symptom assessment (quality of life index). Statistical analysis included descriptive analysis, two sample t-test, Poisson regression, and Wilcoxon signed-rank test. The sensitivity and specificity of ADSC were 77.9 and 98.6%, respectively, in men and 74.3 and 96.2%, respectively, in women. The area under the receiver-operating characteristic curve was 0.92 in men and 0.94 in women. The self-assessable ADSC is effective to screen out LUTS in the general population. Compared with the traditional symptom evaluation, the self-assessable ADSC is efficient and convenient. It is especially useful to screen out LUTS in those who cannot attend in specialized clinics or in nonurgent conditions.The University of Colorado at Boulder is no longer using a network password in its employee login system, a change that expands the security of an application used to conduct campus business and is cheaper than building new authentication software. The move to a system that does not require a password for user log-ins, as of July 1, is part of the university's new security policy, said Susan Caballero, director of information technology for the CU-Boulder campus. The overall security of the system is stronger, she said. It's more secure from the standpoint of how the system is being used on the campus, she added. It also provides an opportunity to create different user-account types that have different permissions and access. And it is cheaper than building new authentication software, she said. "The main costs are the time and effort to build the system from scratch, and we felt that if we were going to try to use an existing system we should use that one because there are so many others to choose from," Caballero said.
